The Language of a Broken Heart. The following lines by the late Mrs. Mathit, derive a peculiar interest from the fact that they were the last penned by that unfortunate lady :

O, would this crushed and bleeding heart Could cease to struggle, and be still; Long has it served, and been a mark For the world's scorn and vulgar will. Yet now it breaks; 'twill bear no more; "I was over-burthened long before. O, tell me not-let me not hear The scorn they shower upon my name! For oft 'tis whispered in my ear, And thrills to madness my poor brain.

And there are times at which I crave

The drear, dark mystery of the grave.

And am I never to be free From slander's tongue, and envy's vow! Ah! is there no sweet charity Dwells in the earth-born here below, That thus they smile upon the blow Which struck a young girl to the dust, And dashed forever from her heart The dreams of bliss she long had nurs'd-And bade them all disperse, depart?

And must it ever be, as now?

Have they no pity for the fate Of one thus made so desolate? They do not know-they cannot feel How deep the wounds their slight words make, Wounds which once given, nought can heal, Or ease the sensitive bosom's ache. But ah, it is my lot to bear Of this world's ills a heavy share.

HAYDN'S EARLY LIFE. - Poor, freezing with cold in a miserable garret, he studied by the side of his old broken harpischord: the ardor of his genius alone left to animate him in contending with the difficulties of the way. At length he was fortunate enough to obtain some lessons in Italian singing from his introduction to a family of a Venetain nobleman, Ambassador at Vienna. The famous Porporo was still retained in his household, and Haydn most eagerly sought his favor, in the hope of obtaining also his instruction. Humiliation, and many a "hope deferred," he had to endure; for Porpora was ill-tempered beyend conception, and although poor Haydn rose early every morning to brush his coat and shoes, and arrange his wig in the nicest order, in expectation of propitiating him, he had seldom more than the polite epithet of "fool" bestowed on him for his pains. And this was the future illustrious author of the

At the age of nineteen, his voice breaking, he was expelled from his class at Stephen Church, where he had sung II years, and his only asylum was in the house of a wigmaker, named Keller. Unfortunately, his residence there had a fatal influence on his after life; for his host, too desirous seemingly of making ample provision for his young guest, proposed uniting him to one of his daughters, whilst Haydn, engrossed in his studies, having no thoughts of love, made no objection; and afterwards keeping his word with scrupulous honor, the union proved far from happy. On leaving the house of his Five Miles South of Indianapolis, and near the M. friend Keller, (we do not know for what reason.) for six long years he endured a bitter during the winter he was compelled to lay in bed for want of fuel and other necessaries.

Willis is translating for the Home Journal a recent article by Paul de Kock, entitled " Madame J. Not in." We copy a chapter of it for the malicious anecdote related there-

MADAME'S REASONS "Not In."-It is not always to be supposed, when you are refused admittance to a lady's door, that she is preoccupied with an uninterrupted tete-a-tete. It is enough that she has the migraine, or an "attack of neuralgia," (whatever that is,) greatest and most impregnable of reasons, that her toilette is not yet made.

The prettiest women on the globe, (believe you this?) do not like to be taken by surprise. They forgive anything sooner than an invasion of their presence during the mysteries of that complex exercise of arts and sciences by which their beauty is daily heightened. The most confidential male friend, the most precious lover, the husband of years, are alike secretly unwelcome, till Madame has completed at least the unconfessed enhancements of her loveliness.

And—considering what pains even pretty women feel obliged to take-judge what must be done by those to whom nature has refused beauty, and who to supply the deficiency, have inevitable recourse to the inventions of modern chemistry-their dressingrooms being museums of curious aids and remedies, cosmetics, dyes, essences, powders, pomatums and plumptitudinizers. One of the most charming women of Paris not long since happened to receive one of these untimely calls, when her confidential maid, by some chance, was out upon an errand. Never suspecting a gentleman to be at her door whose attentions had of late somewhat pleased her, she herself answered the bell. But Madame was one of those many who never show themselves to the world till heaven's original work upon them is entirely re-done-re-appointed re-perfumed, rerounded and alabastered.

"Ma-dame!" stammered the unexpected comer, as the door opened and the apparition of the face, AU NATUREL, was revealed to his half-recognizing vision.

"Madame is not in!" said she, with the greatest coolness suddenly shutting the door upon farther parley, and leaving the intruder to retire upon his suspicions.

The difference was so great between the lady done and undone, however, that he departed speculating on the gradual resemblance which even an old dressing maid may acquire to her young mistress, and convinced that Madame was not in-a simple fact which the lady herself assured him of, that same evening, with infinite regret that it should
